The First Grouse Hunt. Grouse were probably first shot fly-ing by the Young Pretender, when he was "in the heather," after Culloden. During his wanderings among the Outer Hebrides grouse were very abundant, and he exercised his royal prerogative by not waiting for the twelfth of August. Next to a capacity for drinking neat brandy which could see their stoutest "bowismen" under the table, Prince Charlie excited the admiration of his faithful followers by his skill with the "fesse," killing grouse equally well "on the ground or on the wing." The latter was a startling novelty to the Highlanders, none of whom could perform the fest.

could perform the feat. According to the late Sir George Dasent, at the beginning of the last century, a man use to teach "the new art of shooting fly-ing" to the boys of Westminister School, who in those brave days could
